MISCELLANEOUS READING. DE QUINCEY.

The North American Review for January contains an article on De Quincey, from which the following description of the man is taken: "In person he is anything but preposse ing; being diminutive in stature, and awkward in his movements, with a shrivelled, yellow, parchment skin. His head, however, s superb, and his face remarkably sensitive and expressive; the eyes sunken, but brilli ant with the fire of genius and the illumi nations of opium. In mannershe is a model of decorum, urbanity, and natural unaties ted gentility. He is a magnificent talker, and a fine reader; which last quality he notes as a rare accomplishment, whether among men or women. He is genial and hospita-ble in his household. He performs set tasks of walking, day by day, in his garden, and marks his progress by deposits of stones. He has offered his body, after death, to the surgeons, for dissection, as his contribution to physiological science. He seriously be lieves that the dreadful grawing of the stomach, already alluded to, which arises, perhaps, from the collapse and impotency of that organ through the use of opium, is caused by the ravages of a living animal. He is singular in his habits, often disappears from his home for days together-noinquiry being made after him by his friends-and returns as mysteriously as he went. He has two daughters, one of whom is married to an officer in the Indian army: the other and eldest presides over the house, and acts as his amanuensis "

ANECDOTE OF JUDGE BRACKENRIDGE Like most men of genius, the late Judge Brackenridge was distinguished by many striking peculiarities. He chose to do every thing in a manner to please himself, with out caring for the observations of others. When he resided at Pittsburg he was in the practice of going every morning during the summer to bathe in the Alleghany; and in order to save time and trouble in undressing, he walked to the river with no other habili ments than his cloak and slippers. One of those votaries of humor who are to be found in almost every part of the country took it into his head to have a little fun at the learned gentleman's expense; and, one morning, just as he had set out to indulge in his customary dip, the wag hired an Irish laborer who was passing by to keep a watch upon the "unfortunate gentleman," telling Pat that he was a little out of his mind, and that his friends feared he intended to make away with himself. On walks the Judge, and clos after his heels his newly engaged keeper. Off goes the old cloak; and, just as the sup posed maniae was about taking the fearful leap, his faithful guardian seizes him firmly by the arm, exclaiming, "Och, not so fast, my gay fellow! you shan't commit so great a sin this time if Paddy Malone can help it!"-And, sticking fast to the wonderful eccentrie, he replaced his cloak and slippers, and led him safely to the hotel .- Harper's Magn
